Reflection

To prepare for family conferences, I created a self-assessment for students to take reflecting on their learning behaviors. I made sure to update the questions to reflect the way school currently is by asking about at work areas and following zoom rules. One of my goals is to teach students to be self-reflective and make goals for themselves. This is also a culturally sustaining practice teaching students have a choice in their goals and education.

The school I was working when I made this self-assessment has an extraordinary way of doing conferences. First, they call them family conferences, which reflects and highlights how every family is different and not always made up of 2 male and female parents. Additionally, it is not just for parents and teachers. Students are not only at the meeting, but they lead it. Students are given a chance to share their learning experiences with their families in their own words and reflect on their strengths and growth areas. As an emerging teacher, it is cool to see how these unique conferences are held and influence how I see relationships with families. Including

Students typically complete a self-assessment before these conferences. I demonstrated innovative thinking by adapting an assessment and making it applicable to online learning by changing the questions. Additionally, I changed the format to a google form to make it easier for students to complete remotely.
